Liliana talks

... about why she joined PwC

After my studies, I wanted to work in transaction services. I was soon attracted to PwC by its expertise in this area, its broad range of education and training, and its global presence.

PwC's application process is very professional. Candidates have a fair chance to present themselves, while the company comes across as open and ready to help. The atmosphere at my job interview was friendly, and so was the team I met after the interview. This made joining PwC feel like the right thing to do.

As a newcomer, I received a warm welcome, and felt part of the team in a very short time. After two helpful introduction days, I immediately started project work. Since joining in October 2011, I have contributed to a wide range of projects, in which we have advised banks, insurance companies, aerospace companies, utilities and SMEs on their transactions.

Every project is different and exciting in its own way. You work in international teams, either on the buyer or on the seller side, for corporate clients or private-equity institutions. The transactions may be national or international, and a project usually lasts two to four weeks.

My project work has already taken me abroad for several weeks in Luxembourg, Germany and the United Arab Emirates. Events and training courses within PwC also regularly take me to places in Switzerland and Europe.
